

What are the major sūtras in later Indian Buddhism?

Kaie MOCHIZUKI

Introduction

In modern textbooks on Indian Buddhism most of the authors introduce the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra and the Samādhisūtras as early Mahāyānasūtras, the Saddharmapuṇḍarikasūtra and the Amitābhāsūtra as middle Mahāyānasūtras and the Tathāgatagarbhasūtras as later Mahāyānasūtras. This classification seems to be orthodox in the countries of the Chinese Buddhist tradition. But I wonder if it really reflects the main history of the Mahāyānasūtra in Indian Buddhism. Though, to be sure, they play an important role in Chinese and Japanese Buddhism, some of them would not always be major sūtras in the later Indian Buddhist literature. I think that Indian masters accepted sūtras in a different way from that of Chinese masters. The former seem to have read sūtras to prove their original philosophical ideas on the basis of the texts, while the latter seem to have built their schools based on sūtra which they think most important in their philosophical point of view. This is clear from the fact that the separate Chinese schools of Buddhism are based on separate sūtras, but in the Indian Buddhism the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra is important not only in the Mādhyamika school, but also in the Yogācāra schools. I think that we need to reconsider the tradition of Mahāyānasūtras from the point of view of Indian Buddhism.

1. Commentaries to the Mahāyānasūtras collected in the Tripiṭaka

Before I consider the citation in the anthological texts, I would like to discuss the Indian mahāyāsūtras which have their commentaries in the Tripiṭaka. We can see them in the mDo tshogs 'grel section and Sher phyin section of the Tibetan Tripiṭaka.

At first, in the mDo tshogs 'grel pa section we can count eighteen sutras which have commentaries to them. But 1.2 and 21.1 in the Appendix I are written by Chinese masters, so they must removed from our discussion in this context. Therefore the number of sūtras becomes seventeen and that of the commentaries is thirty eight, and that of the authors is twenty three. Among them, No.17 has four commentaries. As is well known, the confession of their sins (āpattideśanā) or purification of obscuration by karma was a famous topic based on the Triskandhakasūtra in the later Indian Mahāyāna Buddhism. No.20, of course the last section of the Gaṇḍavyūhasūtra, has five commentaries and we can see many citations from it also in the later Indian Buddhist texts.

Though Asaṅga appears four times in this list, we can count three of them as one. Vasubandhu appears six times, Nāgārjuna three, and Kamalaśīla two. It is worthy of notice that six commentaries are attributed to Vasubandhu.

The commentaries to the Prajñāpāramitā are collected separately as the Sher phyin or the Abhisamaya literature in the Tibetan tanjur. This means that this sūtra is the most widely read or most popular sūtra in Indian and Tibetan Buddhism. The number of sūtras is seven, that of the commentaries is twenty-four, and that of the authors is twenty-two. Because there is no name of Nāgārjuna and only one commentary attributed to Vasubandhu here, the tradition of Abhisamaya seems to have started in the later Indian Buddhism.

We can see many sūtras with their commentaries also in the Chinese Tripiṭaka. The number of sūtras is fifteen, that of the commentaries is twenty, and that of the authors is five. These numbers are less than those in the Tibetan tripiṭaka. It is doubtful whether some of the commentaries are written in Indian or by Indian masters. No. 4.2, the Daśabhūmikāsūtravyākhyāna by Vasubandhu, no. 5.1, the Kāśyapaparivartatikā by Sthiramati, no. 11.1, the Gayāśrīṣasūtraṭīkā by Vasubandhu, and no. 15.1, the Caturdharmakasūtrasāstra are also in the Tibetan Tripiṭaka, these commentaries which are translated into both Chinese and Tibetan would have Indian originals. Two commentaries are attributed to Nāgārjuna (Nos. 1.1 and 4.1) and thirteen texts which compose sixty-five percent of these commentaries are attributed to Vasubandhu.

2. Mahāyānasūtras which cited in the anthological texts in Indian Buddhism

There are three anthological texts in the Mādhyamika section of the Tibetan tanjur, namely the Sūtrasamuccaya attributed to Nāgārjuna, the Śikṣāsamuccaya of Śāntideva and the Mahāsūtrasamuccaya of Dipaṅkaraśrījñāna. They consist of citations from Mahāyāna sūtras, and rarely śāstras and vinayas. The authors does not relate their own opinions, but express them with their contents of citations. Their themes are practical steps to Bodhisattva.

The Tibetan translation of the Sūtrasamuccaya has 68 folios in the sDe dge edition and it is one-third of the Śikṣāsamuccaya or the Mahāsūtrasamuccaya. 72 sūtras are cited there and the total number of citations comes to 174. The most frequently cited sūtra is the Prajñāpāramitāsūtra, cited 12 times. The second is the Bodhisattvapīṭakasūtra, cited 8 times, and the Vimalakīrtinirdeśasūtra and the Candragarbhasūtra* (or Zla ba 'i snying po 'i le 'u) are cited 7 times. And the Ma skyes dgra 'i mdo (in Tibetan) and the Ratnarāśīsūtra follow at 6 times and the Śraddhābalānāvātāramudrāsūtra, the Tathāgataguhyasūtra and the Gaṇḍavyūhasūtra are cited 5 times. Because this anthology is smaller than the other two anthologies, these numbers are also smaller.

The Tibetan version of the Śikṣāsanuccaya has 192 folios and this length is almost the same as that of the Mahāsūtrasamuccaya. 88 sūtras are cited there and the total number of citations comes to 359. Though the Vimalakīrtinirdeśasūtra is cited twice in the chapter 15 in its Sanskrit version, these citations are lacking in the Tibetan translation. It means that this text would be enlarged in the Sanskrit version or shortened in the Tibetan. The most frequently cited sūtra is the Ratnameghasūtra, cited 29 times. Then the Dharmasaṅgītisūtra, the Ugraparipṛcchāsūtra are and the Akṣayamatisūtra are cited 22 times and both the Sāgarāmatisūtra and the Candrapradīpa-samādhirājasūtra 19 times. Though they are cited also in the Sūtrasamuccaya, the citations in this text are obviously more various than those of the Sūtrasamuccaya.

The Tibetan version of the Mahāsūtrasamuccaya has 198 folios and it is the longest of these three. 83 sūtras are cited there and the total number of citations reaches 273. There are some problems in this text. For example, the Samādhirājasūtra is called here not only the Candrapradīpa or the Sarvadharmasvabhāvasanatāvīpañcita but also the Mahākaruṇāvātārasūtra (sNying rje chen po la 'jug pa'i mdo). And the Ratnarāsisūtra is called here as the Kāśyapaparivarta, but the citation from the sūtra called the Ratnarāsisūtra could not be identified in those sūtras. The most frequently cited sūtra is the Candrapradīpasamādhirājasūtra, cited 21 times with three variations of name. The second is the Ratnameghasūtra, cited 13 times, which is most frequently cited in the the Śikṣāsanuccaya. Next the Maitreyamahāsiṃhanādasūtra and the Buddhapītakaduḥśīlanigrahīsūtra are cited 11 times. The former is cited twice in the Sūtrasamuccaya, but the latter is never cited in other anthologies. Then the Sāgarāmatisūtra and the gZi brjid can gyi mdo, of which Sanskrit title could not be identified, are cited 10 times.

In the end I counted the total numbers of citations in these three anthologies. The most frequently cited sūtra is the Ratnameghasūtra, cited 46 times. The second is the Akṣayamatinordeśasūtra, cited 28 times, and the Dharmasaṅgītisūtra, the Ugraparipṛcchāsūtra and the Sāgarāmatisūtra are cited 27 times. I know, of course, these numbers have no meaning, but it is possible to say that these sūtras are popular in Indian Buddhist literature. Further we must consider also the situation of their compilations. Had the compilers of these anthologies read all sūtras cited there before compilation? Could they pick them up from the collections of sūtras like a Sūtraṭīka in the Buddhist library? Or did they know the set phrases of texts transmitted from the other texts? These anthologies can give us some hints how sūtras had been transmitted in India.
